President's Message

by Traci Schafer

Stopping By Woods On A Snowy Evening

By Robert Frost

Whose woods these are I think I know.
His house is in the village though;
He will not see me stopping here
To watch his woods fill up with snow.

My little horse must think it queer
To stop without a farmhouse near
Between the woods and frozen lake
The darkest evening of the year.

He gives his harness bells a shake
To ask if there is some mistake.
The only other sound's the sweep
Of easy wind and downy flake.

The woods are lovely, dark and deep,
But I have promises to keep,
And miles to go before I sleep,
And miles to go before I sleep.

This poem is lovely in many ways, but I often find it cycling through my mind—especially the last two lines—when I'm tired. As with many of the rest of you, I work all day at something other than writing. The job I really love (writing) doesn't start until the evening when I'm already tired. But I press forward, day after day, weekend after weekend, with the drive that my story has to make it out into the world. My characters will accept nothing less. Maybe for some of you, your writing challenge is not trying to balance another job. It may be sending query after query, or trying to navigate the world of marketing and social media, or any number of other steps that not only get a book out into the world, but make the world take notice of it once it's there. My wish for you all is that not only do your stories find the readers they deserve, but that you take the time to stop and watch the woods fill up with snow, or listen to the sweep of easy wind, or whatever else helps you breathe in the life around you and make your miles along this writers' journey a little less daunting.
